Not your father's air base

BY JOHN COOPER SR.
NIMAC Chairman

As a child in the 1960s, I fondly recall watching the C-119 Flying Boxcars take off from the Niagara Falls Municipal Airport, wondering if my uncle, Lt. Col. Kenneth Holmes, was on board as he flew with the 328th Tactical Airlift Squadron.

Times have changed since those nostalgic days, and today's Niagara Falls Air Base represents a new era in military aviation.

Over the years, the base has undergone numerous mission changes, evolving significantly since the 1960s. Today, it operates a mix of both vintage and cutting-edge aircraft, reflecting the diversity of the United States Air Force's fleet.

As the host to two Air Force Wings – the 914th Air Refueling Wing, Air Force Reserve Command, and the 107th Attack Wing, New York Air National Guard – the Niagara Falls Air

Base plays a critical role in national defense. The 914th Air Refueling Wing is tasked with providing combat-ready forces for global mobility and strategic deterrence, operating the venerable KC-135 Stratotanker. Recently, the wing achieved a significant milestone by becoming "nuclear ready," demonstrating its readiness and capabilities.

Meanwhile, the 107th Attack Wing operates the MQ-9 Reaper, one of the most advanced aircraft in the Air Force's arsenal. With a 24/7 mission flying the MQ-9 Reaper worldwide, the 107th ensures the defense of our nation, supported by geographically separated squadrons like the 222nd Command and Control Squadron and the 274th Air Support Operations Squadron.

Despite the changes over the years, the resolve and dedication of the men and women serving at the Niagara Falls

Air Reserve Station remain unwavering. While it may not be the air base of our fathers' generation, its commitment to defending our nation's freedoms remains steadfast.
